The 2014 Israel-Palestine crisis has uncovered deep divisions within French society

Citation: DRAKE, H., 2014. The 2014 Israel-Palestine crisis has uncovered deep divisions within French society. LSE EUROPP Blog, 15 October 2014

Additional Information:

- This article was published on the LSE EUROPP Blog. It is available under a Creative Commons licence (CC-BY-SA-3.0).

Metadata Record: https://dspace.lboro.ac.uk/2134/16472

Version: Submitted for publication

Publisher: LSE EUROPP

Rights: This work is made available according to the conditions of the Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 4.0 International (CC BY-SA 4.0) licence. Full details of this licence are available at: http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/

Please cite the published version.
EUROPP BLOG

France and the 2014 Israel-Palestine crisis

Helen Drake

On 8 July 2014 the Israeli government launched Operation Protective Edge against the Gaza strip. Its targets were rocket and mortar fire from Gaza as well as the tunnels supplying the territory, and its weapons were airstrikes and a ground invasion. One week after the outbreak of hostilities French President François Hollande, in his July 14th Bastille Day TV interview, proclaimed that ‘we cannot import the [Israeli-Palestinian] conflict into France (...). I will not say that we are pro-Israeli or pro-Palestinian: we are pro-peace’. (Hollande, 2014). Hollande’s words were directed less at the parties to the conflict themselves than to those responding to it on the streets and in social media at home in France. Rallies and demonstrations had been organised in Paris and other French cities in which by far the greater number of protagonists expressed their solidarity for the Palestinians, especially the civilians killed, maimed or displaced by this third offensive by Israel on Gaza since 2008. On three occasions in Paris the demonstrations were accompanied by acts of menace or 1 Helen Drake, Professor of French and European Studies, Loughborough University and Chair of UACES (University Association of Contemporary European Studies), the UK’s leading subject association for the study of the EU and Europe. Recent publications include Contemporary France (Palgrave, 2011).

---

violence in the direction of France’s Jewish communities, with synagogues as specific targets, and the French authorities subsequently stepped in to ban a pro-Palestinian demonstration planned for Saturday 19 July 2014.

How far do these reactions to the Israel-Palestine crisis of summer 2014 hold up a mirror to contemporary France? In the foreground we see French policy itself towards the Israel-Palestine conflict. This response has for at least three decades been voluntarily ensnared in a web of collective multinational governance spun principally around the European Union, the United Nations and France’s key allies including the UK and the USA. From within this cocoon, the French voice emphasises Israel’s right to security, Israel’s right to defend itself when attacked, Israel’s duty to act proportionately, and the desirability of a political solution to the crisis crafted by the international community. Observers of French politics including Bronwyn Winter (2014) contend that during Nicolas Sarkozy’s presidency (2007-2012) France took a more friendly line towards Israel than had become the norm in France where public opinion is nowadays more neutral than engaged on either side, and where the pro-Israeli positions of half a century ago have long given way to a more nuanced navigation between France’s interests relative to the conflict. The events of 2014 have so far revealed a François Hollande cautiously endorsing his predecessor’s position at the same time as his Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius has used tough talk to denounce the bloody consequences of Israeli attacks on Gaza: the age-old friendship between France and Israel, argued Fabius, does not justify the ‘killing of children and the massacre of civilians’ (Fabius, 2014).

What lies in the background to this stance? Jeremy Jennings has noted how France today is a ‘de facto multicultural society’ (2013, 517), and Christopher Hill shows us how this ‘multiculturality’, meaning ‘ethnocultural diversity’ (2013: 12), complicates the ‘national interest’ in whose name foreign policy is conducted. In the French case, the religious heterogeneity of the population (it is home to the biggest populations of Muslims and Jews in Europe) has challenged an important pillar of French identity – the credo of laïcité, French state secularism – and this in turn has fissured the bedrock of national interest as an expression of a singular national identity.

According to laïcité, the state is neutral towards all faiths; all faiths, in turn, have a duty of fraternity towards each other; and in all cases public displays of faith, individual and collective, are discouraged by law (hence the banning of the Muslim veil and burqa from most of public life); this is the rejection of multiculturalism, in the sense of claims to group rights. In contemporary France, religious difference and reactions to these differences, especially from the political and intellectual classes, have come to operate as proxies for more entrenched cultural wars over the meaning of Frenchness, complicating the task of coherent and consensual responses to sectarian conflict far from home where it resonates with different communities in France. Politicians such as former President Nicolas Sarkozy and leader of the French Front national Marine le Pen have notably come to legitimise an exclusionary discourse of national identity, stigmatising Otherness where it most visibly departs from the norm. Intellectual debate has diagnosed French society as afflicted by both ‘Islamophobia’ and ‘Judeophobia’, and what Pascal Boniface calls the ‘media intoxication’ (La Vie 2014) around the Middle East crisis (including Syria) has certainly cast the summer’s disturbances as an ultra-polarised stand-off between France’s pro-Arab and pro-Jewish supporters.

France is still digesting the consequences of its colonial past, its post-decolonisation present, and the reality of persistent anti-semitic sentiments. As far back as 1995, French film director Mathieu Kassovitz memorably portrayed in la Haine a dystopia of street life in the notorious Paris banlieues where its characters are poisoned by injustices, real and imagined, metered out according to stereotypes and prejudices regarding the Arab and Jewish Other. Nearly two decades later the actor Saïd Taghmaoui, who played the Maghrebi Arab Saïd in the film, participated in inflammatory Twitter exchanges on the subject of the Israeli-Palestine conflict of 2014: old fiction updated with new fact.

The quintessential vulnerability of France today – to the repercussions of its past on today’s social peace; to the meaning of foreign wars for different groups within French society; to the geopolitical balances required in an interdependent world of nations co-existing under the nuclear threat – will continue to stress the Fifth French Republic, peace or no peace in the Middle East. French Muslim Mohammed Merah’s killing of three soldiers and four Jews (three of whom were children) in Toulouse in 2012; the Franco-Algerian born Medhi Nemmouche’s fatal attack on the Brussels Jewish Museum in May 2014; and the horrific beheading of French tourist Hervé Gourdel by Jund al-Khalifa jihadists in Algeria in September 2014 ‘because he was French’ (le Monde, 2014) were each in their own way a deliberately gruesome and graphic message that there is and can be no 100% secure firewall between the Hexagon and the rest of the world.

References

