Notes from the dividing line

This item was submitted to Loughborough University's Institutional Repository by the author.

Citation: FEATHERSTONE, K., 2015. Notes from the dividing line. Paris Lit Up Magazine, 3, p.35.

Additional Information:

- This is a poem published in the Paris Lit Up Magazine, licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 4.0 Unported License.

Metadata Record: https://dspace.lboro.ac.uk/2134/22728

Version: Published

Publisher: Paris Lit Up Press

Rights: This work is made available according to the conditions of the Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 4.0 International (CC BY-NC-SA 4.0) licence. Full details of this licence are available at: http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-sa/4.0/

Please cite the published version.
Notes From The Dividing Line

At the edge of everything
a sniper, hidden behind old ironwork, lines up his shot.

In this country the days lie heavy.
We wait for dark. In the evening we cry around braziers and stamp our feet.

Somebody’s careful aim,
between fires and smoke,
from a balcony,
is a single movement.

And a figure starts to turn,
slowly along the axis of the earth and falls. His lips facing away from his death. Then I hear a cracking sound.

The guts of one man lie dirty, and the shoulder
of another turns away, deep in grief again.
I’ve tried to send you a sketch of this;
but the outline, like a pilot’s false horizon, twists. It was supposed to be clear.
That’s how it is at the edges.

The days are heavy, but they do not last.